before taking part in a war-dance,[1] And Moto would act as mediator between the god and the people, who if they had a sick child would soro[2] to Ulumatua and take gifts, when the child would live.

"And Gala, which is the chiefly tribe here, is tauvu[3] to Boma on Taveuni Island, and thus we think that Ulumatua must have come here from that part. To this day the cavu[4] of the Gala tribe is 'Ulumatua'; and our young men, when they go forth to the Tiqa match, cry out 'Ulumatua,' to speed their spears along the chosen ground. And this you may have heard, sir, even at the great missionary meeting last week. Of course, the god can give them no assistance now, for the light has come amongst us and we no longer give credit to such foolish tales."

I replied that we all knew that Adi Letila was too enlightened to believe in such things nowadays, but as I walked away under the great avenue of mango trees I wondered!

[1] Only recently I found Inia, my native sergeant of police, oiling two snakes which he had captured. I asked him why he did it and he replied that he thought they liked it, and he intended to treat them well and make pets of them; though I am convinced there was no idea of snake worship in his mind.
[2] Ask forgiveness for any faults.
[3] Of common origin.
[4] Battle-cry.
